

Oliver Dudfield leads the Commonwealth Secretariat's work supporting member countries to maximize and protect the contribution sport can make to sustainable economic, social and environmental development. He has spearheaded the intergovernmental organization's globally recognized initiatives on sport and the Sustainable Development Goals. This includes overseeing the Secretariat's role coordinating international efforts to quantify and enhance the contribution of sport to this global agenda.

Over his career Oliver has worked with United Nations and intergovernmental agencies, national governments, sporting bodies and civil society organisations on policy design, strategy and partnership projects. He is the author of multiple publications on enhancing the contribution of sport to human and social development. He started his career as a basketball coach and coach educator, working in the national systems in Australia and New Zealand.